

Corrective Action Taken by United States Army Acquisition Support Center

In response to an article written by FederalNewsRadio.com on Friday, April 4, 2008, regarding an error made by the United States Army Acquisition Support Center (USAASC) in a posting to its Web site, we would like to reassure those whose personal information may have been inadvertently listed that we have taken action to both remove the information from USAASC's Web site and verify that no other personal information remains available on the Web site. Additionally, we took the Web site down to ensure the situation had been rectified. Furthermore, we have reviewed our procedures for posting information to the USAASC Web site and will be instituting additional steps and processes prior to new materials being added or updated on the Web site.

USAASC and its staff members serving our country around the world, sincerely regret the error made and the additional delay incurred in taking corrective action. In accordance with federal directives, as well as a matter of policy and practice, USAASC works diligently to safeguard both sensitive data and personal information. As an agency that strives to ensure our workforce is responsive to Army requirements, sized and trained properly, and equipped with the right tools, we want only the best for the men and women in uniform and those who support them.

At USAASC, we are confident that we have appropriately addressed this issue and instituted new policies so that such an oversight will not occur in the future. Again, we regard people's personal information as extremely private and worthy of the highest level of protection and we greatly appreciate the understanding of those involved.

Respectfully,
Craig A. Spisak
